In a thermal-fusion bonding method in a semiconductor device manufacturing process, a temperature of a substrate on which a semiconductor device is to be mounted is detected in order to carry out soldering of the substrate and the semiconductor device. The temperature detector device includes a temperature detector such as a thermocouple, and a temperature detector terminal electrically connected to the temperature detector by soldering. The temperature detector device, in general, has a temperature detector packaged in a casing, and a temperature detector terminal is electrically connected to the temperature detector via an outer lead terminal. In some cases, as described in, e.g., Patent Document 1 (Japanese Patent Application Laid-Open No. 2003-178656), the temperature detector device has an inner lead terminal or a tapered outer lead terminal inserted into the casing and electrically connected to the temperature detector. In another type of the temperature detector device, a temperature detector and a temperature detector terminal are molded into a resin casing together with a detector circuit, and thus no outer lead terminal is needed. In the case of the temperature detector device with the tapered outer lead terminal, however, it is necessary to manually insert the tapered outer lead terminal and hence labor is needed in the connecting operation. The temperature detector device with the inner lead terminal or the tapered outer lead terminal has a problem that the connecting portions are hard to wind in the molding operation. In the case of the temperature detector device with the internal detector circuit, the thermal resistance between the temperature detector and the casing is large, and therefore a temperature measuring operation cannot be conducted at a high accuracy.
