This is certainly the most anticipated update to Lightroom CC yet. It's twice as big, changes the import and export rendering process, adds page-level cropping, and adds a new export mode for 4K images. It's also the first real version to allow the export of raw files, but it could have done a better job integrating with Photoshop, which is now the new standard. They also did away with the rating system. No one seems to care either way. Since Lightroom CC now has a totally revamped import/export engine, it's fairly easy to guide you through the process. You can now import files into the library and browse the library from the dropdown menus. (Previously you would have had to use an external browser.) This is the first version to support JPEG 2000 raw files (though you could use the original file without issues) and it integrates well with Photoshop, so when you're editing images in Photoshop, smart objects are displayed in the panels. Best of all, though, is the way that Lightroom now handles editing. You can select the Smart Objects you want from those edit boxes. Once you select them, you're able to place them onto the canvas, or move them around until you're happy with how they're positioned. Then you can add or remove filters, text, and so on. This version also allows you to export larger sizes (2400x3600) and you can batch-edit images all at once. This is a huge step forward – especially if you use a lot of smart objects. In addition to those you may have already noticed, there are a few other new features. These include a new version of the Develop UI, as well as a new grid for zooming in and out. This allows for an even more precise selection and it's great timing since Lightroom's search engine is a crapshoot.
