The "slide to" feature is from the OralB software Adobe bought a few years back. In SLIDeo: Pro, photos are immediately toggled between horizontal and vertical by simply twisting your iPad; there's no "slide to" feature. Also, there's a lot of "small" things that really do make the difference. The grid around the image has 4x1 squares that toggles between having over 3,000 colors and over 54k colors. If you have a heavy-handed-colored photo, you'll notice a difference almost immediately. It's a real pleasure working with Adobe's RAW-centric way of workflow, placing the most important things on the left side of the screen, and having only one pane of information rather than three. But equally, it is a bit on the boring side in terms of the appearance of the interface. I read a lot of stuff online about this, and the consensus seems to be that it's user-configurable. I was able to tweak something about the shadows. Perhaps it works best for a narrower range of colors, but I was able to get closer to what I wanted. Many of the people who I work with at Evolve Creative use the iPad whenever possible to work on their projects. Photoshop is one of those programs. While using Photoshop on an iPad certainly removes some of your desktop's advantages, there are also some benefits to being able to view and work on your images from nearly anywhere that you may have them. And even if you don't need to view them on an iPad, they create excellent handles for keeping track of your projects.
